

Now there dwelt in the days which are called latter, in a region far to the west of the wicked town of Gotham, two matrons both of whom were entitled to be called fair. And the one had her dwelling place in the city which is Zion over against Ensign Peak, while the habitation of the other was in a windy village about a (fine) Sabbath day's journey to the north. And it came to pass that on a day in the month which is set apart for the millinery openings and held sacred to the god of hats, the one dwelling to the north set out with her face toward Zion and essayed to journey thither for the express purpose of purchasing headgear wherewith to decorate herself and arouse the envy of her dwellers round about. And so it was. Setting foot up-on the streets of Zion she journeyed north and south a short distance even unto the east and west seeking the piece of headgear which her heart desired. And the marvel was that she found it. It was displayed in the domain of a milliner of great skill and resources and had rested in that spot but one day, having been brought from the exceeding wicked but much admired village beyond the seas, where hats and other things have their origin.

Now it so chanced that the other fair one whose dwelling place was established even in this same town, had arisen while it was yet early, (for her) and journeying down the street which is the rendezvous of all seekes after headgear had espied that same piece, and likewise having set her heart on it had ordered it sent forthwith to her. it, had ordered it sent forthwith to her tent. Now in those days the custom prevailed of allowing certain pieces of headgear to remain on display even after the bills for the same had been made out and the goods ordered delivered. And so it was. She of the windy village, after sundry comments on the attractiveness of the article in question and the extreme price, likewise ordered it sent to the region to the wise ordered it sent to the region to the northward about the space indicated. Now the milliner into whose hands had been consigned this precious and much desired article was known for her shrewdness and sharp business ability as well as for her skill at the trade, and she reasoned thus within her head; How shall it be known that it is not the same? For behold this one dwelleth afar and the other lives over against us, and if by chance I should copy this article and send the counterfeit to the northward a space who shall know the difference thereof? And she had decided to copy the original and thus wisely make two sales where only one would have been possible.

A pear in a Balcony' at the studio of Miss Davis next Saturday evening before a few friends, who were not able to be present at the club. Now she of the north abode in her home after the piece of millinery was purchased and had arrived as per contract, about the space of an hour, or programme. as long as one may take to adjust a new and gorgeous piece of headgear with numerous hat pins. And she journeyed forth to a region in the neighborhood where were many women hold ing forth on the glories of euchre, which was the religious ceremony much observed in those days. And behold when she entered the room thereof their tongues were holden. But for a short time only, when they began to prate of the wondrous work of the milliner. the glories thereof than again the bell rang and the door of that tent opening, admitted the other fair one who had fair journeyed to the north about thirtyfive miles for the purpose of showing her new and glorious purchase. And reka they were exceedingly sick, and they hated each other with a mighty wrath. And in their secret hearts and likewise to their close friends, of whom they had many, they vowed their hatred to-ward that milliner and each other. And when this story was noised abroad, be-hold the manager of that shop wherein milliner labored did increase be wages by a percentage in proportion to her work, because it was said and truly that they could not tell the two articles apart.
